

Dear [Friend's Name],

I hope this letter finds you well. I've been reflecting on our friendship lately, and I felt it was important to reach out to you.

I want to start by saying how much you mean to me. The times we've shared have been some of the best moments of my life. I truly value the bond we have created over the years.

However, I realize that there have been moments recently where my actions may have hurt you or caused a rift between us. For that, I am sincerely sorry. I never intended to make you feel this way, and it pains me to think that I might have jeopardized our friendship.

Please know that I am committed to making things right. I miss our conversations, our laughter, and the support we've always given each other. I believe our friendship is worth healing, and I would love the opportunity to talk things over and rebuild the trust that might have been lost.

Let me know if you're open to meeting up. I really want to understand how you feel and work through this together. You are too important to me to let this go unresolved.

Thank you for taking the time to read this. I truly hope we can move forward, stronger than before.

With all my heart,

[Your Name]
